Recently I heard an interview on Radio Times (WHYY) on our attitudes about aging. The guests were Susan Fiske, Professor of Psychology and Public Affairs at Princeton University and Jay Olshansky, Professor in the School of Public Health at the University of Illinois at Chicago. As soon as I got to the office, I emailed Dr. Fiske and invited her to speak at PSRC. Come hear her speak about her research on aging and stereotyping on Jan. 15.

Dr Fiske is a social psychologist known for her work on social cognition, stereotypes, and prejudice. Fiske leads the Fiske Lab at Princeton University and is examining emotional prejudices on the neural, interpersonal and cultural planes. Fiske’s research has resulted in major theories in social psychology.

There is a lot of ageism in our culture. Dr. Fiske noted that age is seen as all about loss, decline and decay. Old people are seen as nice but not competent. Magazines are filled with advertisements for products that will melt age away. Articles present ideas for how to stay young. Even professionals in our field have published materials advocating taking over for parents when they reach age 70. Dr. Olshansky added that oftentimes these attitudes originate in a perceived tension over scarce resources such as money and jobs.

Both guests emphasized that in reality all generations are interdependent. Society needs older people who can share the wisdom they’ve gained from experience along the way. Adapting to changes allow us to grow into old age with a high level of functioning. Research indicates that most people get more cheerful and have a more positive outlook on life as they age.

Dr. Olshansky added that oftentimes these attitudes originate in a perceived tension over scarce resources such as money and jobs.

We may also participate in perpetuating the idea that aging is bad. Carol King, our Next Step Director, recently forwarded a blog post (gotoretirement.com) to me, entitled “do you want to defy your age?” It was commenting on an AARP article about celebrities it labeled as “age-defying.” The blogger objected to AARP holding up age-defiance as a goal. “No one should think that natural ageing is an illness or health condition that needs to be prevented or corrected.” The blogger argues that we should accept aging rather than trying to defy it, which only causes stress. But at the same time, we should work to counteract the negative health effects of aging by eating properly, exercising mind and body, and getting sufficient sleep.

It seems to me that a healthy community includes people of all ages who have many opportunities to interact and to work together. This provides space for all generations to give from their areas of strength and experience, and for people to get to know each other as individuals rather than lumping people into groups by age (or any other feature) which contributes to stereotyping. Find occasions to demonstrate your strengths and wisdom, as well as spaces to seek assistance from younger people (such as technology). Watch for ways that you buy into the age stereotypes of both older and younger people, and look for ways to break through them. Participate in communities that are intergenerational, such as families, neighborhoods, faith communities, and other civic organizations. Speak up when you hear ageist remarks. Demonstrate pride in your age and all its benefits. Each one of us can make a difference.

Susan W Hoskins, LCSW

NEXT STEP PROGRAMS

Next Step is a PSRC program focused on planning your retirement and encore career.

Speaker - Tues., Jan. 14, 7:00pm at Princeton Public Library. “Taxes in Retirement” with Martha Ferrari, VP of Financial Planning, Halberstadt Financial Consultants, Inc. Think your taxes will go down when you are retired? Not so for everyone. Come to this discussion about retirement and income taxes to gain a better understanding of 1) how income tax is calculated,
2) why you would want to know your personal tax rate and 3) a few strategies that may be useful. Martha is a CPA and fee-only CFP, with a practice in retirement planning, trust and estate administration and taxation. No charge. Just drop in.

Living with Purpose - a discussion group Thursdays, Jan. 16 & 30, 6:30pm at SPB. How does one actually do this, when, as the poet James Richardson tells us, "nothing important in life comes with directions." A purposeful life gives us a sense of why we are alive, yet the task of taking responsibility for answering this question can seem daunting. Through a small learning community we will use poetry, song and personal reflection to better understand what living with purpose means for each of us. Led by Lillian Israel and Debra Lambo, MA, LCSW. No charge. Register at 609-924-7108.

GrandPal Subs Needed

Some GrandPals are snowbirds in January and February, while others fly away in March and April. We need GrandPal substitutes for the following sessions:

Monday- Community Park  9:15-9:45 (2nd graders)
Tuesday- Riverside 11:50-12:30 (kindergarten)
Thursday- Riverside 1:35 -2:15 (kindergarten)

We read to children in the school libraries for about 30 minutes. We promise fun, the great feeling you'll get from reading to children, and a luncheon in May!
